

One Wild Yell And Then Silence

In a message received recently from the American front, Reuter's correspondent tells of the historic struggle in which the Yanks captured and held Seringes. When after much to-and-fro fighting, there were signs of a fresh attempt by the Germans to retake the village, the Americans withdrew to allow the enemy to occupy it, as it had never before been occupied. But the Americans at once commenced an encircling movement and then the tragic fighting began.

The Prussian guard, the correspondent says, had vowed not to surrender, and their opponents were just as anxious to see the thing through. It was almost wholly an affair of small arm shooting, but the Americans proved to be the better shots. Slowly, very slowly, and by picking off here one man and there another, the Americans began to quell the fire from the village. Slowly, very slowly, the ring of fire closed in about it. It was like the encircling of some furious beast by the coiling of a snake. As the ring drew closer and the defenders saw their doom approaching their fire grew faster and faster, but still the Americans came unfalteringly on, like some unavoidable stroke of fate. At last, when the Americans reached the precincts of the village, their fire ceased altogether. With one wild yell they closed with their foe.

CLASH OF STEEL AND BUTTS

The fierce uproar then suddenly gave place to a strange silence as man grappled with man, only the clash of steel, the crash of broken butts and the groans of the stricken being heard. But the issue was never for an instant in doubt. At this kind of fighting the Yanks are more than equal to any Prussian guardsmen, and in a little more than ten minutes all was over. Except for a few wounded prisoners, every German in the village had breathed his last. Such was the final capture of Seringes, a fit theme for any American painter who can rise to the occasion, for there will never be one more suitable to demonstrate the spirit which America has brought with her into the war.

During the night the enemy twice attempted to retake Serig, but each time he was repulsed with all the loss on his side. Then he made a fierce assault on Meurey farm, which was still piled with dead he left

Supt. H. M. Cummings Visits Logan

Superintendent H. M. Cummings, general superintendent of the schools of the Mormon church, conducted a tour of investigation last Monday of the military and mechanical training now being given to the soldier mechanics at the Utah Agricultural College with a view to gaining facts that will prove helpful in the installation of similar work at the Brigham Young University at Provo. Nearly 500 men are now being trained at the college as radio experts, machinists, carpenters, chauffeurs, gas engine experts, blacksmiths, concrete layers and horseshoers. Three hundred men of college grade are expected shortly to qualify as telephone electricians.

A careful study of the plans of the new building being constructed to provide a mess hall and quarters for part of the detachment convinced Superintendent Cummings that the Brigham Young University could do no better than duplicate this building and he secured copies of the plans for this purpose.

there the day before, when every man defending it fell at his post.

The pride of the professional soldier was up against the pride of the free man, both preferring defeat to surrender. Later still came the attack on Seringes. For the first time since we crossed the Ourcq the enemy may be said definitely to have taken the offensive. All three battalions of the Prussian Guard were apparently in line. Thus a memorable day ended everywhere in victory for us, although there was no great gain of ground.

In the night ground near Clerges was also captured by American troops, so that an advance will now be possible in this sector which will enable the troops engaged to join hands with the conquerors of Serig and Seringes.
